

Social Security Benefits and Disability

Because Social Security regulations are so complex, determining which social security benefits you qualify to receive can be a challenge. To make the process easier, here are answers to some of the questions frequently asked by applicants for disability benefits.

SSA is only for people whose disability is complete and who have been disabled (or are expected to be disabled) for one year or more, so there are no partial disability social security benefits. If you need partial disability, you will have to apply through a state or local disability program. You will still be able to receive state and local disability benefits if SSA denies your application because you are not completely disabled.

However, even if you are deemed to be completely disabled, you can keep working while receiving disability social security benefits, provided you are sufficiently disabled that your work capacity is low. When you apply for disability, the state agency in charge of your case will assess your total earning capacity. If you can still work but your maximum possible income falls below a certain amount, you can still collect disability benefits. Note that the agency will consider how much you CAN earn, not how much you DO earn: If you could earn above the minimum by changing to a different job that you are trained to do and physically capable of doing, then you will be considered ineligible for social security benefits. You will not be pressured to do work you are not able to perform. The state agency takes into account applicants health, age, experience, and education when evaluating which jobs they are suited to do. If you need help moving to a better job that would enable you to support yourself, assistance is available.

Many applicants are told by their doctors that there is no further treatment for their condition, but their social security agents ask them to continue visiting doctors. If this is what you are dealing with right now, there is an explanation! First, your regular doctors may not be able to provide all of the information the state agency needs to evaluate your case. The agency will arrange for you to see a doctor who has the specialized experience or equipment necessary to complete the examination. The examination is part of your case evaluation, not a part of your treatment plan.

Second, disability is not always permanent, and even untreatable conditions can improve. It is a good idea to have regular examinations to track the progress of your condition. Your health may improve enough that you can return to work, even without medical treatment.

And third, medicine brings new miracles every year. Why let resignation steal a possible cure from you? It is a small nuisance compared to the huge lifestyle benefits you could reap. See here also Social security attorney florida ... " title="Get more on Social security lawyer">Veterans lawyers ...

About the Author

For more info on social security disability lawyer, try HilandPonton.com.

Source: <http://ArticleMe4.com>